The America Reads Challenge

The America Reads Challenge, initiated in 1996 by President Bill Clinton, and America Counts (1999), unite parents, teachers, college students, care givers, volunteers, business people, and children with one goal; to ensure that every American child can read well and independently by the end of the 3rd grade. The network of America Reads-Counts programs allows for the use of federal work-study funds to support reading tutoring by college and university students. This network also includes volunteers from Americorps, Vista, and numerous other agencies and projects. The aim is to provide an “army” of volunteers to provide one-on-one attention to help students who are struggling in reading and math. Gainesville Reads is the University of Florida’s response to the America Reads Challenge.

The primary goal of Gainesville Reads at the University of Florida is to increase reading achievement among the children of Gainesville and surrounding areas. The focus of these efforts is tutoring of children at public and private elementary, middle and high schools, community recreation centers, and faith-based organizations. A secondary goal of the America Reads Challenge project at UF is to develop and foster strong partnerships between the university and other community members.

Gainesville Reads is supported by:
The Jessie Ball duPont Religious, Charitable, and Educational Fund

The Jessie Ball duPont Fund is a national foundation having a special, though not exclusive, interest in issues affecting the South. The Fund accomplishes its mission by working creatively with the approximately 350 individual institutions whose eligibility was determined exclusively by Mrs. duPont's prior personal philanthropic decisions. These institutions- diverse and rich with resources- provide the Fund steady access to an impressive array of contemporary ideas, visions, and talents. The Fund uses its resources

- to enable the Fund, in concert with these institutions and their partners, to address broad-based issues of the larger society that have regional, national, and even international relevance; and
- to assist these institutions in developing the internal capacity to meet the present and future needs of their specialized constituencies and local communities.
